While some people advocate for a move toward standardization, others feel that not having strict requirements helps the profession remain more egalitarian and open to non-traditional means of education. Only 41% of software engineers have a Computer Science degree, and 47% of professional web developers do not have a four-year degree at all. With such a large portion of professionals in the industry coming from non-standard backgrounds, it's not surprising that there aren't standard ...
